Investigations of Detail Design Issues for the High Speed Acoustic Wind Tunnel Using a 60th Scale Model Tunnel.

Part 1 National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA),2018-07-18 This report summarizes the tests on the 1:60 scale model of the High Speed Acoustic Wind Tunnel (HSAWT) performed during the period of November 1989 to December 1990. Throughout the testing the tunnel was operated in the 'open circuit mode', that is when the airflow was induced by a powerful exhaust fan located outside the tunnel circuit. The tests were first performed with the closed test section and were subsequently repeated with the open test section. While operating with the open test section, a novel device, called the 'nozzle-diffuser, ' was also tested in order to establish its usefulness of increasing pressure recovery in the first diffuser. The tests established the viability of the tunnel design. The flow distribution in each tunnel component was found acceptable and pressure recovery in the diffusers were found satisfactory. The diffusers appeared to operate without flow separation. All tests were performed at NASA LaRC. Barna, P. Performance Tests of the Original Transonic Wind Tunnel Compressor and Circuit Y. Y. Link,H. A. Quick,1998 A detailed test programme of the AMRL Transonic Wind Tunnel was conducted. The objective of the test programme was to determine the pressure distributions around the tunnel circuit with larger nozzle exit areas. The existing high speed contraction, test section, model support mechanism, and downstream diffuser were removed for the tests. A variable nozzle and collector were designed and installed in place of the removed components to determine the effects of increasing the nozzle exit area. Three nozzle configurations were investigated, with a 38.3%, 44.4% and 58.1% increase in area relative to the existing test section area. Measurements were made of static pressure around the tunnel circuit, total pressure upstream and downstream from the compressor, and temperatures at various locations. Noise measurements were also made outside the tunnel complex and at four locations around the boundary of the site to determine the noise level of the wind tunnel.

Acoustic Performance of the Geae Ups Research Fan in the NASA Glenn 9- By 15-Foot Low-Speed Wind Tunnel National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA),2018-05-22 A model advanced turbofan was acoustically tested in the NASA Glenn 9- by 15-Foot Low-Speed Wind Tunnel in 1994. The Universal Propulsion Simulator fan was designed and manufactured by General Electric Aircraft Engines, and included an active core, as well as bypass, flow paths. The fan was tested with several rotors featuring unswept, forward-swept and aft-swept designs of both metal and composite construction. Sideline acoustic data were taken with both hard and acoustically treated walls in the flow passages. The fan was tested within an airflow at a Mach number of 0.20, which is representative of aircraft takeoff/approach conditions. All rotors showed similar aerodynamic performance. However, the composite rotors typically showed higher noise levels than did corresponding metal rotors. Aft and forward rotor sweep showed at most modest reductions of transonic multiple pure tone levels. However, rotor sweep often introduced increased rotor-stator interaction tone levels. Broadband noise was typically higher for the composite rotors and also for the aft-swept metal rotor. Transonic MPT generation was reduced with increasing fan axis angle of attack (AOA); however, higher downstream noise levels did increase with AOA resulting in higher overall Effective Perceived Noise Level.
